Preferential binding of measles virus to myoblast-bearing monolayers of rat skeletal muscle origin. The in vitro infection of rat skeletal muscle origin monolayers by virulent strain of the measles virus (strain 3CVI) resulted in preferential binding of the virus to myoblast-bearing monolayers when compared to fibroblast-bearing monolayers. Following binding of the virus to the myoblast-bearing monolayers the cells were highly permissive to viral replication, whereas fibroblast-bearing monolayers were refractory to viral replication. Virus binding was temperature-dependent; binding was optimal at 39 degrees C whereas viral RNA synthesis was optimal at 41 degrees C. Binding of measles virus to myoblast-bearing monolayers was insensitive to chloramphenicol which indicated that viral RNA synthesis was not required for viral attachment to myoblast-bearing monolayers. Uptake of virus by myoblast-bearing monolayers was inhibited by the addition of EGTA, suramin and by acid treatment of the cell monolayers.
